him that Brodfe had been shot and he at once sent me to take charge of the left wing. It was more open country here, and at least I was able to get a glimpse of my own men and exercise some control over them. There was much firing going on, but for the life of me I could not see any Spaniards and neither could asy one else. Finally we made up our minds that they were shooting at us from a set of rest-like funch buildings a good way in front, and these I assaulted, finally charging them. Before we came anywhere near, the Spaniards, who as it proved, really were inside and around them, abandoned them, leaving a few dead men. Its the time I had taken possessing of these buildings all firing had reased everywhere. I had not the faintest idea what had happened; whether the fight was over, or whether this was merely a bull in the fight.

whether the fight was over, or whether this was merely a lull in the fight; or where the Spanlards were, or whether we might be attacked agin; or whether we ought ourselves to attack somebody somewhere else. I got my men in order and sent out small parties to explore the ground in front, who returned without finding any for "Ex this time as a matter of fact, the Spanlards were in full refrest.) Meanwhile I was extending my line so as to get into touch with our people on the right. Word was brought to me that Wood had been shot—which fortunately proved not to be true—and as If his were so, it meant that I must take charge of the regiment, I moved over personally to inquire. Soon I learned that he was all right, that the Spanlards had retreated along the main road, and that Colonel Wood and two or dree other officers were a short distance away. Before I reached them I encountered a captain of the Ninth cavalry, very glum because his troopers had not been up in time to take part in the fight, and he congratulated me—will visible effort—upon my share in our first victory. I thanked him condially, not confiding in time that till that moment I myself knew exceedingly little about the victory, and proceeded to where Generals Wheeler, Lawton and Chaffee, who had just come up, in company way that I had handled my troops, first on the right wing and then on the left! As I was quite prepared to find I had committed some awtin sin. I did ny best to accept this in a nonchalant manner, and not to look as relieved as I left. As throughout the morning I had preserved a specious aspect of wisdom, and had commanded first one and then the other wing, the fight was really a capital thing for me, for practically all the men had served under my actual command, and thenceforth feit an enthusiation belief that I would lead them aright.

It was a week after this skirmish before the army made the advance on Santiago. Just before this occurred General Young was stricken known will fever. General Wheeler, who had commanded the cavalry division, was put in general charge of the left wing of the army, which fought before the city itself. Brig. Gen. Sam Sumner, an excellent officer, who had the second cavalry brigade, took command of the eavalry division, and Wood took command of our brigade, while, to my intense delight, I got my regiment. I therefore had command of the regiment before the stiffest fighting occurred. Later, when Wood was put in command in Santiago, I became the best constables in the city. the brigade commander. Late in the evening we camped at El Peso. There were two regular officers the brigade commander's aides, Lieuts. A. L. Mills and W. E. Shipp, who were camped by our regiment. Each of my men had food in his haversack, but I had none, and I would have gone supperious to bed if Mills and Shipp had not given me out of their scanty stores a big sandwich, which I shared with my orderly, who also had nothing. Next morning my budy servant Marshall, an ex-soldier of the Ninth (colored) cavalry, a fine and faithful fellow, had turned up and I was able in my turn to ask Mills and Shipp, who had eaten all their food the preceding evening, to take breakfast with me. A few hours later gallant Shipp was dead, and Mills, an ex-ceptionally able officer had been shot through the head from side to take to the cycs, yet he lived, although one eye was blinded, and before I left the presidency I gave him his commission as brigadler general. before I left the presidency I gave him his commission as brigadier general.
